Disability for days of work

40. (1) Despite sections 38 and 39, a worker suffering a temporary total disability or temporary partial disability is only entitled to be paid compensation for those days for which the worker would, in the usual course of his or her employment, have received remuneration.

(2) The Commission may consider a worker who is seriously and permanently disfigured as being permanently and partially disabled.

Additional compensation

43. The Commission may, by such amount and for such time as it considers just, increase the amount of a pension to which a worker is entitled, if it considers the amount of the pension to be significantly inadequate because

- (b) the worker's annual net remuneration before the personal injury or disease did not fairly represent the worker's probable earning capacity.

Recurrence while receiving pension

44. (1) If a worker receiving a pension for a permanent partial disability suffers a recurrence of a temporary partial disability or temporary total disability from the same personal injury or disease, the worker is entitled to receive additional compensation equal to the compensation payable for that temporary disability reduced by the amount of the pension already being paid for the permanent partial disability.

- (a) the net monthly remuneration in the year in which the original personal injury or disease occurred; and
- (b) the net monthly remuneration in the year in which the worker suffered the temporary disability.

Multiple injuries or diseases

45. If a worker receiving a pension for a permanent partial disability later becomes entitled to compensation for a subsequent disability because of a different personal injury or disease, the worker is entitled to receive the compensation payable for the subsequent disability in addition to the amount of the pension already being paid for the permanent partial disability.
